USPA NEWS - Have you ever felt like you were being followed—not just in a paranoid sense, but genuinely being followed? Like every corner you turn, every move you make, the cars behind you are doing the exact same thing? This has happened to some people before, but they never really thought too much about it until now. Gang stalking, essentially, is where a group of people conspire to go against one specific person, also known as a targeted individual.

Gang stalking refers to a belief held by some individuals that they are being systematically harassed and surveilled by a coordinated group of people. This phenomenon is characterized by reports of various forms of intrusive behavior, such as being followed, watched, or otherwise targeted in ways that disrupt daily life.

Here's an account from someone who experienced this. They said, "Yes, I can tell you a lot about my experience with it. It's crazy because I didn't know what it was at first. I typed what was happening to me into Google and discovered I wasn't the only one. Basically, it's a group of people who follow you in multiple cars. They all look harmless, but their intention is to make you look crazy and destroy you by making it appear self-inflicted. They follow you, point cameras at you, and let others know they've spotted you, streaming it on the dark web. It's like imprisonment on the streets. They do whatever it takes to ruin your day—damaging your car bit by bit, invading your privacy at home, and even using radiation to brainwash you. It almost always ends in a mass shooting or suicide because you start to think everyone is against you since so many people are involved. They also threaten you and try to turn everyone against you. If anyone tells you what's happening, they risk being entered into the program themselves and having their lives turned into a living hell."

"They send people to get close to you and find ways to destroy you while making it look like you did it to yourself. For example, a person might follow you in an innocent-looking car, but if you confront them, it could be an old lady or a man with kids, making you look like the aggressor. This goes on for months or years, and the more you try to fight back, the more intense it gets. They make it known that you're not crazy, but they never show it to others—only you see it, making you sound crazy if you talk about it."

"The people targeting me hacked everything: my phone, Wi-Fi, and used lasers and radiation to spy on me. They entered my home, tampered with my belongings, moved things around, and left. When I searched online, I found terms like 'targeted individual' and 'role player surveillance team members,' linked to companies like Dark Star Intelligence LLC. These job postings are for role players and surveillance team members to support surveillance operations, conducting discreet surveillance, observing and documenting activities, and participating in training scenarios."

"I couldn't believe it when I saw these job postings blatantly out there on the internet. I went to the store today, and I was ready to confront anyone who even looked at me wrong. They target people who speak out too much, whistleblowers, or those who've crossed someone with influence. This whole thing is so weird, evil, and sinister. The fact that those supposed to govern us are controlling this is disturbing. There's so much more I could say about this, but I don't want to make this too long."

Gang stalkers will do everything possible to drive their target to insanity. Their objective is to erode the target's credibility completely, making them appear mentally unstable.

The primary mental illnesses they will accuse the target of having are schizophrenia or paranoia. By doing so, they ensure that any claims of harassment or surveillance made by the target are dismissed as delusional or symptomatic of these conditions, effectively isolating the individual and undermining their ability to seek help or be believed by others. This insidious tactic aims to make the target's life unbearable while making their distress seem self-inflicted and irrational.

Gang stalkers are often believed to be part of the elite, those who have the resources and influence to orchestrate such extensive harassment. These individuals or groups are typically characterized by a historical pattern of unethical behavior, leveraging their power and connections to manipulate and control others. By utilizing their vast resources, they can employ a variety of tactics, from surveillance and harassment to psychological manipulation, all aimed at discrediting and destabilizing their target. This orchestrated effort serves not only to torment the individual but also to protect the interests and secrecy of the elite, ensuring that any opposition is effectively neutralized.

Individuals who claim to experience gang stalking often report:

Persistent Surveillance: They believe they are constantly monitored by multiple people.

Harassment: They describe coordinated efforts to intimidate, discredit, or undermine them through various forms of psychological harassment.

Technological Interference: Reports of electronic harassment, such as tampering with devices, hacking, or the use of technology to create disturbances.

Community Involvement: The involvement of neighbors, coworkers, or even strangers in the harassment campaign.

Understanding Gang Stalking

To first understand gang stalking, one must grasp its purported primary objective: to drive the targeted individual to a state of mental instability in a manner that leaves no tangible proof of the harassment. This psychological manipulation, often described as gaslighting, is intended to undermine the victim's sense of reality and credibility. By creating a pervasive environment of surveillance and subtle harassment, the orchestrators aim to induce confusion, paranoia, and distress. The goal is to push the individual to act out or behave irrationally, thereby discrediting them and making any claims of harassment appear delusional. This insidious process traps the victim in a cycle of self-doubt and societal mistrust, effectively isolating them and making it nearly impossible to substantiate their experiences.

When you become aware of what you believe is gang stalking, the perpetrators often manipulate you further by feeding you a narrative that you are somehow special or "the chosen one." This tactic, akin to strategies used TV productions, aims to exploit your emotions, and create a false sense of importance. By continuously dangling the prospect of some unique destiny or secret role, they keep you engaged and compliant. This psychological manipulation not only deepens your sense of paranoia but also makes it harder for you to break free from the cycle of harassment. This method leverages the same techniques seen in media to maintain control and heighten your emotional investment in the orchestrated reality being imposed upon you.

The main problem with gang stalking arises when law enforcement and police adopt these same strategies to facilitate their jobs and track the movements of targeted individuals. The misuse of taxpayer-funded resources to carry out unconstitutional acts against citizens and residents constitutes a severe abuse of power. Such actions not only violate individual rights but also undermine public trust in governmental institutions. It is imperative that those who engage in or authorize these practices be held accountable, ensuring that all citizens are protected from unjust and illegal surveillance and harassment. Public awareness and legal reforms are essential to address and prevent these abuses of power, safeguarding the fundamental rights and freedoms of every individual.

As the number of victims of gang stalking increases, the government's reluctance to address the issue and take accountability remains concerning. Despite growing reports and evidence from affected individuals, there is still a lack of official recognition or action to investigate and mitigate these claims. This reluctance may stem from various factors, including potential involvement of influential groups, the complexity of proving coordinated harassment, or a lack of awareness and understanding within governmental bodies. The failure to acknowledge and address gang stalking not only perpetuates the suffering of victims but also undermines public trust in the government's ability to protect its citizens. It is crucial for there to be greater transparency, investigation, and accountability to ensure that all individuals are safeguarded from such abuses.
